also contributed to this choir invisible, we take comfort to ourselves that they did not live nor die in vain. From the mingled blood of our native and adopted population alike, spilt on foreign battlefields, that humanity might reach its highest level we are made cognizant of that Americanism which has become a passion with us—an Americanism that abides with us in times of peace no less than in a call to arms and Americanism that spends itself in righteous living in upholding democratic institutions, in toleration of the sacred rights of others and in the undivided allegiance to our flag. In this sense the old Memorial Day has become an Americanization Day.

It is well indeed that we decorate the graves of our fallen heroes—but it is better that we consecrate our lives to everything that is an exponent of the grandeur of this country. And in thus dedicating ourselves to this holy task we shall find no time and no inclination to borrow the drastic and revolutionary thoughts of Europe's submerged peoples—subversive of anarchy, bolshevism and chaos. And further, each succeeding Americanization Day will find, not only the excellencies of American citizenship simplified in those born of the soil, but also in those hundreds of thousands who have adopted this country as their own—and with the native born are willing to lay down their lives for its weal—iterating the sublime of our nobles to poets:

"Our hearts, our hopes, are all with thee

Our hearts, our hopes, our prayers,
our tears.

Our faith triumphant o'er our fears
Are all with thee—are all with thee."
